It has been experimentally proved that the production of most varieties of apples, pears, plums, cherries raspberries and gooseberries depends upon the transmission by insects or me fertilizing pollen from flower to flower of different trees or varieties. Among the various insects that assist in the transferring of pollen, the honey bee is certainly the most important single agent. Fruit growers in California seem to have realized this, since many of them pay the beekeepers from two to five dollars for each colony of bees placed in the orchard. Recent experiments have brought out the fact that cotton especially long staple varieties, depends to a considerable extent on insects for pollination. It is recognized that growers of long staple varieties of cotton will find beekeeping a distinct advantage to the cotton crop. In regard to the value of cotton as a honey plant the reader is referred to page 30. There is an old theory that bees will injure ripe fruit, especially grapes. This supposition is entirely unwarranted as has been shown by many investigators. That bees will not injure the skin of sound fruit can be determined by anyone by placing sound fruit in a hive, where it is surrounded by thousands of bees. It will be found that the fruit remains uninjured. Ripe fruit is often injured by birds or wasps, and bees will try to secure the fruit juice that would otherwise be lost. The Colony A colony of bees...
