Only by this constant drill with the arithmetical processes become fixed in the mind of the child. Accuracy, rapidity and facility in the application of the processes learned to the problems of every day life are the chief ends of instruction in arithmetic. This book of thirteen hundred problems supplies adequate material for supplementary work. From it the teacher can select such problems as fit the needs of her school. The use of the book in the hands of the pupils will ca found most satisfactory; it will relieve the teacher from dictating problems or copying them on the board.
