The marked sluggishness of peristalsis which obtains with this diet, and ammoniacal fermentation of the intestinal contents by bacteria, aid in the formation of the calculi. Usually the larger examples are single; but of the smaller sizes there may be dozens or hundreds in one intestine. In addition to pressure erosions caused in the mucous membrane by these calculi, they may produce fatal results, especially by accidental impaction and obstruction at some narrow part of the intestinal tube. Horses which take in sand and mud in drinking from pools (and the same is true of hogs from swallowing ground while rooting) occasionally get large masses of such material into the intestine and may as a result suffer from the formation of diverticula. In pigs bristles which are swallowed may be massed together in the intestine by the peristaltic movements into cylindrical bristle balls; in ruminants hair which has been swallowed may form in the abomasum one or more spherical, felt-like bunches, and in the same way remnants of plant fibres may also be compressed into similar balls here (piliconcements, phytoconcements, bezoars).
