CHAPTER III AIRS AND GRACES In this chapter, which from its nature cannot pretend to be exhaustive, we are concerned with certain ornamental foibles; ebullitions of animal spirits incident to young ladies and gentlemen in the first blush of printed publicity. Our quotations, it is true, do not all correspond strictly to this description; but the reader has already observed that the worst faults can often be quoted from the best authors; it remains for him to reflect that such faults can be tolerated in them--and only in them. Habit, too, has something to do with the matter; some of the journalists quoted below could perhaps tell us whether the downward path of inversion, entered in extreme youth, is easily abandoned. It seems a fair inference from contemporary literature that the negative equipment of many writers may be summed up in three rules: do not split your infinitives; do not use the word reliable; do not place a preposition at the end of a sentence. On these three rules the novice exhausts his powers of abstention. After much painful juggling with prepositions that seem by some perverse law of nature to gravitate towards the end, he looks about for a little ornament, by way of recreation; and, since three hard-and-fast rules do not make an education in taste, he is not very particular where he finds it. Among the numerous temptations that assail him, we select a few, beginning with Certain Types Of...
