Not illustrated. 1886 edition. Excerpt: . CHAPTER VII. THE FAVOURITES OF THE FANCY. I. THE ALMOND TUMBLER. The Almond Tumbler occupies the throne of supremacy in the Pigeon kingdom, and it bears its honours with becoming dignity and ease. The Pouter has his admirers, so has the Carrier, but the Almond is the worthy chief of the wondrous three. Where is its peer? It is a prince of beauty, a paragon of comeliness, a banquet of splendour. Can you find another bird radiant in such magnificent clothing; of carriage so courtly, and manners so engaging? The Pouter's plumage is a thing of daubs and patches. Its legs are models of deportment--encased in feathery breeches, terminating in an amplitude of Indian moccasin enveloping the entire foot in feathers. When standing on its block at full poise, the Pouter reminds me of Mr. Pickwick perched on his chair, dressed in...
